Kansas City's most complete reception site guide

One of the most important aspects of a wedding is the party, so choosing a reception site should be a top wedding planning priority. There are hundreds of venues to choose from and even more things to think about before even viewing a spot.

First, consider the type of wedding you're having. Formal affairs require a larger area for a sit-down dinner, while a simple cocktail buffet works for an afternoon wedding.

Then, take a look at your guest list. Does the venue you're eyeing comfortably hold the number of guests you've invited?

Also, some reception facilities allow outside caterers, and others do not. (See our catering key below.) So be sure to check with each venue before signing a catering contract.

And speaking of signing on the dotted line—discuss the terms of every contract thoroughly before making your final decision. Be sure the document specifically outlines cancellation policies, deposit amount and when the balance is due.

Catering key

Catering availability differs from place to place. To make it simple, we've divided it into three categories. Here's a guide to what each means.

No: Facility does not offer catering services, and off-site catering is welcomed.

Yes: Facility does offer catering, but you can bring in an off-site caterer if you prefer.

Through facility: Facility does offer catering, and you cannot bring in an off-site caterer; you must use theirs.
